

LIFE AND DEATH.

I believe it has never occurred to anyone that the process of bringing to life is the same as dying. Though a bit complex the processes and its understandability, but I'll try as much as possible to break it down in the simplest form.

Now, the whole process and throughout the duration of the conception until the final birthing is never an easy one. The woman goes through a lot until the final period when she is relieved of it. When a woman puts to bed the embryo becomes a "Child", the placenta used as a connection between mother and child is cut and thrown away if not the child might die or the mother might suffer from complications, this is the same chord the child uses in feeding and drawing nutrients from the mother, but upon delivery the chord becomes useless and thrown away, so is the case with death, when someone dies the ties and connection with the living is cut and forgotten for life, that's why the person that eventually becomes a "Corpse" when met with death is buried and not kept with the living.

Secondly, when a child emerges out of the body of its mother it can NEVER go back in, when a child is pushed out of the womb into this sinful world no matter how hard the child tries or how much the mother loves the child and doesn't want the child to suffer in this wicked world, the mother can't help but assist the child in adapting to this world; however unpleasant the situation of this world is as at the time the child arrives this world, the child can't go back into the womb of its mother. So is the case with death, once someone is dead the person is DEAD and GONE, no matter how gory, scary or beautiful the world beyond is, the dead person can't come back to this world.

This other one might intrigue you, it's a general knowledge that when a child is born and remains silent, the Doctors or nurses or midwives or whoever it is that receives the child when delivered makes the child to cry just to be sure the child is alive and fine. One might see this as an act of wickedness or being cruel to the child but that is life, life is never fair. Upon death reverse is the case, the active participant (the dead person) is not made to cry unlike the subject of the former (the child), here the relatives, friends, family members, loved ones of the dead do the crying for the loss of someone dear to them. In both scenarios crying is involved.

A child that is exposed to this world for the first time through birth is covered immediately; this prevents the child from contracting a disease or diseases as the case may be or dying as a result of new exposure to a new, different and harsh environment. Nonetheless, the child's body system adapts quickly to the new environment. In death, the corpse is separated and embalmed immediately to prevent contraction of disease from the corpse by those left behind. The corpse is not left exposed as irritable reactions begin to happen to the corpse.

Written and arranged by:
Blessing James
Princess B.J (08133461801)
Sept. 2015.